ABOUT THE NOVEL

The Thirty-Nine Steps is a thriller novel written by Scottish author and politician John Buchan. It is the first of the five novels. As Buchan's son later explained, the name of the book originated when his sister, who was six at that time, was counting the stairs of the private nursing house where Buchan stayed during his illness. The book was published in 1915, prior to the World War I, after first appearing as a serial adventure story in Blackwood's Magazine and attracted a wide range of reader. The book was a major success with enduring popularity. When it was released, The Telegraph, a national British daily broadsheet newspaper, called the novel "one of the finest thrillers ever written". It has never been out of print and has been adopted to the films. What makes this novel so popular is not only the plot but also is its archetypical character. Richard Hannay is the earliest examples of the "man-on-the-run", a man who sacrifices his life for his country. He is believed to predate latter British heroes like James Bond. Thirty-Nine Steps is a classic of early twentieth-century literature and still has a universal popularity.

SUMMARY

After returning from South Africa, Richard Hannay thinks London is not exciting enough for his fast-paced lifestyle. He receives an American visitor in his flat who has a secret. His name is Franklin P. Scudder, and he reveals his secret identity as a freelance spy. He entrusts Hannay with the details of his current mission. Scudder is discovered by a secret organisation who wants to start a war by killing Greek Prime Minister and needs to hide. Hannay allows him to stay in his flat, but few days later, he finds Scudder dead, with a knife on his back. He decides to run away as he is the prime suspect of the murder and being watched by the same men who kill Scudder. He leaves the flat in disguise, wearing milkman's clothes with the black notebook which is full of codes written by Scudder. Although he has no place to go, he keeps running as he is pursued not only by the terrorist organisation but also the police that investigate Scudder's death. On the run, he manages to break the codes and finds out that a group of German anarchists, the Black Stone, plan to steal British naval intelligence to establish a naval blockade and start a war across Europe. He takes a train to Scotland and finds an inn where he spends a couple of days until two men search for him. The inn keeper sends them away, but they come back. Hannay eventually drives off in the car he steals from them.

After leaving the inn, he realises that he is pursued by an aeroplane. He decides to drive fast and stay off the main road to prevent the vigilance, but he crashes into another car driven by a local landowner and politician, Harry Bullivant. Bullivant takes Hannay home as he blames himself for the crash. He tells Hannay that he is on his way to make a speech about the colonies in an election meeting but suffers from stage fright. After seeing Hannay has a deep knowledge, he wants him to deliver the speech on behalf of him. Hannay accepts and delivers the speech. As Bullivant seems trustworthy, Hannay tells his story. He believes him and willingly writes a letter to his godfather at Foreign Office to ask for his help. Hannay sets off again but is spotted again by the aeroplane. He bumps into a roadmender who complains about being tired. Hannay offers him to swap the clothes and work for him. After tricking the pursuers by pretending to be a roadmender, he arrives in a mansion owned by a man who is a member of the Black Stone. Hannay does not reveal his real identity, swearing to be someone else, but the old man locks him up. In his captivity, Hannay finds some explosives and uses them to blast the room apart. He goes to the roadmender's house to take his possessions back and return his. Since he is badly hurt due to explosion, roadmender offers help and provides him a shelter for a few days to recover. He gets on a train to return to London and meets Sir Walter. He explains the situation, but Sir Walter does not believe the Greek Premier's murder plot till he receives a phone call from London telling the Greek Premier has been just assassinated. Next day, he clears Hannay's name in Scudder's murder case. Bullivant and Hannay attend a meeting that night which is organised to discuss the military intelligence. Hannay recognises one of the attendants as the traitor, a member of the Black Stone. Hannay remembers a code from the black notebook, describing "thirty-nine steps" and "high tide" at 20:17. They make research about the lodges with steps. Only Trafalgar Lodge has thirty-nine steps, leading down to the beach. They make a plan and go to the lodge. The Black Stone unmask during the game of cards, and Hannay blows the whistle as a signal to his men to arrest them. One of them makes his way to the yacht, but other boats have been already taken. Three men are arrested. As the Black Stone has planned, the UK enters World War I three weeks later, and Hannay is appointed as a captain in the army.
